

This paragraph starts near the body-end trap and must continue on the next page without flushing any pending words below the footer. The formatter holds a partially filled line while the trap switches to its footer environment. Returning to the body environment must preserve those buffered words for the following page. A no-break page eject is necessary here, not a paragraph break. This text deliberately continues for several lines so that the test exercises an actual interruption within a paragraph rather than only a page change requested by a heading. Every word should survive the transition, remain above the body-end limit, and appear before its own page number in extracted text. The final sentence is a sentinel for checking that the end of the paragraph was not lost.